European University Association Prague Declaration:

Universities outline proposals to combat economic crisis and long-term road map for higher education in Europe

The European University Association (EUA) – an organisation representing more than 800 universities and 34 national university (Rectors' conferences) associations – has today published a Declaration that contains a series of targeted messages to Europe's politicians with proposals from universities to help combat the current economic and financial crisis. Based on the outcomes of the recent EUA meeting of Europe's university leaders in Prague – the Declaration also sets out a long-term agenda for European universities in the next decade identifying '10 paths to success'.

The Declaration - that will be presented to the 46 education ministers attending the Bologna process Ministerial Summit at the end of April – underlines universities' role as a driving force for economic recovery in Europe. However, it stresses that for universities to play their full role in helping European economies out of recession, politicians must commit to major investment in higher education and research. "Europe cannot afford to run the risk of losing a generation of talented people or a serious decrease in research or innovation activity," the Declaration underlines.

EUA urges "decision makers at the national and European level to emulate the major investment in higher education and research that characterises the US economic stimulus package" and which supports both high end research and students and families struggling to pay for higher education. EUA is calling for renewed efforts from governments to reach the Barcelona target of 3% (of GDP) investment in research and the 2% (of GDP) target for investment in higher education proposed by the European Commission. The Declaration recommends that European stimulus packages are needed to: create real opportunities and incentives for young researchers; to tap unused potential through the implementation and financing of lifelong learning across Europe; and to upgrade universities' facilities and campus infrastructure.

Looking ahead to the next decade – the EUA Prague Declaration outlines 10 key success factors for European universities:

- widening opportunities for participation in and successful completion of higher education;
- improving researcher careers;
- providing relevant and innovative study programmes;
- developing distinctive institutional research profiles;
- shaping, reinforcing and implementing autonomy;
- increasing and diversifying income;
- enhancing quality and transparency;
- promoting internationalisation;
- increasing and improving the quality of mobility;
- and developing partnerships.

In the coming months, the EUA Board and Council will develop a specific action plan for each of these 10 issues with recommendations at the institutional, national and European level.

Notes to editors:

Please find below some background information in case this is useful.

1. EUA Political Declarations. Thanks to its role as the representative organization of European Universities and Rectors' Conferences and to its frequent contacts with EU Institutions, international organizations and various stakeholders – EUA has a key function in contributing to European debates in higher education and research. EUA's political declarations result from the discussions held during the EUA Conventions and address key issues for the future of European universities. The policy positions are the documents stating EUA's point of view on a number of topics discussed at the European level.
